REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT

As hectic and unprecedented as the last two months have been for everyone, the resilience of the entire community has been revealed, and President Driscoll said that he'd like to talk about that before digging into what happens next.

The academic community mobilized with due haste and efficiency in response to the global pandemic—all with an unwavering focus on serving students. Within the span of about a week, professors had all classes ready to deliver remotely. It was a mad dash with the support of the IT Services area, and everyone met a very stringent deadline.

The student services areas, in partnership with facilities, custodial services, and the police, safely moved students out of housing and then made counseling and tutoring available online, as well as activities that students find vital to feeling a sense of community.

The Admissions area continues to keep the next class of IUP students engaged through online visitation events, while the University Advancement Division launched the Emergency Response Fund to assist students who have been affected financially. Marketing and Communications pivoted in an instant to focus on keeping the entire university family up to date.

As the adaptation continues, the university also must carry on the work of transforming IUP in changing times—those times that were changing before COVID-19, and the university must move more quickly than ever.

Dr. Driscoll reminded those in attendance that, at the last meeting in December, the issues discussed surrounded enrollment, academic programming, and sustainability planning. At that time, discussion was referring to those circumstances as the New Reality. That now seems somewhat passé, he said, given the pandemic.

The university's job is to design, build, and launch IUP NextGen, springboarding from the resilience, student centeredness, and team spirit IUP rediscovered amid this unwanted and unwished-for crisis. The university has demonstrated that IUP is ready. And IUP must move forward now, before the university falls back into comfortable but outdated habits that will not sustain IUP in the future.

The IUP community has proven that it can quickly mobilize and ignore silos and hierarchies to do all the right things for students, he said. It has been demonstrated, irrefutably, that IUP has consensus on transforming into a student-centered community. Perhaps that was best expressed by Scott Moore and Paula Stossel, who are leading the development of IUP's new strategic plan.

Paula and Scott have met with hundreds of people to discuss a very simple new strategic plan—one that strips away barriers and simplifies processes and will ensure every employee on this campus is prepared to help and direct students and make sure students aren't cast off without a line to safety—whether that's academic, emotional, or financial.

In a recent update to the campus community, Paula and Scott said that the actions seen in the university's response to continue service to students during the pandemic illustrate that the campus community can reach IUP NextGen with the kind of no-nonsense attitude the university needs to take all the time.

Meanwhile, the Inspire initiative and the continued focus on enrollment will ensure IUP has the right programs to offer the students who will come to IUP ready to learn and grow.

Finances always have been a concern. They always will be. The continued work in sustainability planning has been a collaborative one, with stakeholders from across the university community discussing how to increase revenue and reduce costs, without endangering the qualities that make IUP both relevant and special.

The work ahead in that regard is serious. It will challenge IUP, but the perseverance shown in the last several months bolsters confidence that IUP can come out on top, a stronger university than ever before.

Right now, the university is planning for the beginning of the next academic year to take place in the traditional way—in person, and, new this year, with a weeklong rather than weekend welcome experience for new students. But preparations are also being made for other scenarios, because IUP can predict neither the course of the virus nor how students and their families will want to reengage. This work will benefit students this fall but will also move the university smartly toward IUP NextGen.

IUP hasn't been perfect in implementing everything this spring, Dr. Driscoll said. Right now, students are responding to a survey sent out this week that will help to assess how well IUP did and what it can do better, not just in the middle of a pandemic but in all circumstances.

Soon, faculty and staff members will come together for a Summer Academy, through which they'll reflect on what was accomplished and what was learned. Then, they will work to apply the lessons learned to all that IUP does going forward.

Faculty members will hone their skills in technology-assisted education, for fully online courses or to enhance courses offered in more traditional venues, and to reach out to people who need to retool and gain new skills to succeed in a post-pandemic economy.

Dr. Driscoll said that staff members will build on the techniques they pioneered in the crisis to keep students engaged at a distance—virtual Jeopardy, online bingo, shared movie nights when no viewer is in the same room. He also said keeping students engaged is key to their success and what IUP has learned will be applied in more normal times. And, everyone at IUP will learn how to systematize the student focus shown across the university. These are fundamental building blocks of IUP NextGen.

Stay tuned for more great work as the IUP community rides the tsunami of COVID-19 to be better than ever.

President Driscoll turned for a moment to the graduating students—students who have persevered and overcome incredible challenges this semester. IUP had to defer their commencement ceremony, he said, but the pride for this special group of people is not constrained by the circumstances.

This morning, an email went to graduates, sharing a video recognizing their accomplishments. This virtual celebration will continue tomorrow. President Driscoll said he looks forward to congratulating the graduates in person during the rescheduled commencement ceremonies in September and that marking commencement—celebrating students’ success and their matriculation in status to alumni membership in the IUP community—is the best part of what the university does.

In September, IUP will also honor in person the Distinguished University Professor, Alida Merlo, and the University Senate Award winners: John Lipinski for teaching, Francisco Alarcón for faculty service; Dana Driscoll for research, Stephanie Caulder for creative arts, and Julene Pinto-Dyczewski for staff service.

These awards exemplify how the campus community makes student success possible. President Driscoll said he is proud of the awardees, and he thanked them for their hard work this year.
